HIGHLIGHTS

Fresh is best

Sydney chefs have been growing their own.

The market trail

An ever-increasing number of regular farmers' markets.

---

FRESH IS BEST

---

In the constant search for high-quality produce, Sydney chefs have been growing their own. Some of Sydney's most acclaimed restaurants now boast urban kitchen gardens and farms to help chefs work their culinary magic. At the acclaimed Chiswick, Matt Moran has a kitchen garden with produce picked in the morning and on your plate by lunchtime. Moran also uses NSW lamb produced on his family farm in the Central Tablelands. In the heart of the city, Quay's chef Peter Gilmore has a growing room for vegetables and herbs in the restaurant at Circular Quay. In Newtown, Hartsyard has a flourishing kitchen garden: teas are made with fresh-picked herbs from the on-site tea garden. The Restaurant at 3 Weeds uses produce from the on-site organic herb and vegetable garden to create beautiful food, while The Grounds of Alexandria has a micro-farm, bakery and resident horticulturalist.

THE MARKET TRAIL

---

Sydney has an ever-increasing number of regular farmers' markets, many of them selling sustainable and/or organic produce direct from the source. If you're visiting Sydney and you love good food, check them out at Frenchs Forest, Leichhardt, Marrickville, Parramatta, Manly, Redfern, and the Entertainment Quarter Moore Park. There's also The Rocks Foodies Market on Fridays and the Sydney Morning Herald Grower's Market on the first Saturday of each month in Pyrmont. You might encounter a celebrity chef or two: Billy Kwong's Kylie Kwong cooks at Eveleigh Markets and Darren Robertson from Bronte's Three Blue Duck sells his pulled pork buns at Bondi Farmers Markets.

Wander down a quiet lane, take a sharp right toward the trash cans and flash your ID to the non-descript bouncer. Descend the industrial stairs and thru an unlabeled door is The Baxter, Sydney's speakeasy homage to the yonder years of whisky and deal making.

With a wide selection of scotch, bourbon, and rye, if you love the brown stuff then this should be in your must-do list.
